MISS AMABEL'S DESIRE

Amabel Walton. "I'm afraid all of my wishes have been gratified." Miss Walton looked dreamly at the gray old college buildings wearing their ivy green mantles with dignifled submission to the passing years. and a tender smile touched her soft

"There is one unfulfilled wish that haunts my hours," she admitted at

"I knew it," triumphed Stella. "Do you mind telling us about it?"

asked Marion. "It is such a simple wish that you will wonder why I have not gratified it-I am dying to wear pinka soft rosy pink gown-there, am I not perfectly idiotic?"

The little teacher of music at Fenton college looked appealingly at the sympathetic girlish faces of her favorite pupils.

"Why don't you wear it, then?" marveled Stella Mayse. Miss Amabel Watson touched her beautiful snowy hair. "Because it would be so absurd-at my age. But how I longed to wear it when I was a child! I lived with a maiden aunt who looked upon pink as a frivolous color and so it was banned from my wardrobe. I've worn black and white and blue and brown and lavender, but never a bit of pink-and there is my ungratified wish!"

Miss Walton's soft blue eyes were very bright when she finished and there were two pink spots in her unwrinkled cheeks. With her snow white hair she was beautiful and the hair which might have added weight to her years, also lent a freshness and bloom of a youth which was not very distant,

"But that is no reason why you should not wear pink now, dear Miss Walton," insisted Marion Reeves. Do, please!"

"And you look very, very young indeed. Won't you wear a pink frock to the October reception?" "Miss Walton hesitated. "I must have a new frock," she admitted. "Do let us go to town with you and select it,"urged the girls, and at last Amabel Walton consented.

The night of the October reception Amabel regarded her reflection in the mirror with mingled distrust and delight.

In this delicate pink creation she looked a slender, girlish figure—like one of those Dresden china bits on her mantelpiece. There was a murmur of surprise in the room when Amabel entered with Stella and Marion. Mademoiselle Drouet, the French teacher, elevated her sandy eyebrows and whispered ironically to Professor Hanford.

Professor Hanford frowned, and his 1.50 form with such a mixture of admiration and wistfulness in their depths that mademoiselle turned quite yellow with jealousy. She swept away, and Professor Hanford, glad of his release, wandered aimlessly around until he came upon Amabel sitting alone in the deep bay window, a roll of music in her hand and her brown eyes shining with unshed tears.

The professor looked down at her with infinite tenderness in his eyes. "You-you are distressed?" he asked, shyly. The tears fell. "I am foolish," quiv-ered Amabel. "I have worn this ridi-culous frock—"

"Ridiculous!" interrupted the professor. "It is charming. I am wondering why you do not wear it always."

"I am too old to wear pink!" sighed

Miss Walton, without coquetry. "A woman is never too old to wear what is so infinitely becoming," pro-tested the Greek instructor eagerly. "It is a pity that more women do not understand the art of dressing becomingly. Now, pink-pink is my favorite color. Something in his tone made Amabel blush. "It is mine, too," she said hurriedly, 1.50 1.50 and then she went on and told him the pathetic little story of her drabcolored childhood.

When she had finished he nodded 1.50 his head sagely. "You are quite right to wear it, and I predict that it will always be charming upon you-it is the color of hope and youth, Miss Walton, and even to a dry old bachelor like myself it seems to brighten a rather dull future; it emboldens me to tell you a secret-about myself-and my love-for you!" When Marion Reeves came to find her accompanist, there was no mistaking the situation. The quiet-eyed girl read it in the faces of Amabel and the professor, and a charming smile broke the sweet gravity of her 1.50 face.

"Can you spare her to play for me, Professor Hanford?" she asked.

1.50 "For only a little while," admitted the happy man, as he relinquished Amabel's trembling little hand. "You shall be the first to hear the good news of our engagement-and I would never have found courage to ask her 1 50 if it had not been for the pretty rosecolored frock!"

"Blessed be pink!" laughed Marion, 25.25 and as she went away with her arm around Amabel Walton she smiled over her shoulder at the man. "I am going to sing 'Roses, Roses Everywhere,' and I am going to sing it for just you two!"
